: Tyler Trent | Round 6 Clayton Kershaw is such a mainstay with the Los Angeles Dodgers it's hard to imagine the team ever attracting another Hall of Famer. But if star pitchers such as Clayton are as difficult to come by as they appear, a young hurler from Bremerton is as close to Kershaw as we've ever come. Clayton Kershaw is such a mainstay with the Los Angeles Dodgers it's hard to imagine the team ever attracting another Hall of Famer. But if star pitchers such as Clayton are as difficult to come by as they appear, a young hurler from Bremerton is as close to Kershaw as we've ever come. Frankly, by August, the Lastings Milledge signing was beginning to look more like one of Kirk Gibson's game-winning throws than one of the best young players ever to sign with the Dodgers. Today, things look much different. In a 2-1 loss to the Houston Astros, the 19-year-old lefty from Bremerton pitched 7 1/3 scoreless innings, giving up a hit and striking out seven. A throwback to Lincecum and Strasburg, he held left-handed batters to a .077 batting average, the lowest mark in the major leagues. And he held the Astros to one hit with a trio of strikeouts. Trent is an easy seven, and he gets two for free. Pitchers like Trent don't come around that often, and when they do, they stick around a while. He's young enough to go a while, and he might get there someday, but until then, he's our Preeminent Prospect, and appropriately so. 52 + 53 When the Angels signed Ervin Santana, they signed a seventh-starter caliber arm that could moonlight as a number-three guy, and a reliable set-up man. Between Kershaw and Justin Masterson, that's the sum and substance of the Dodgers pitching prospect pipeline. Still, the stretch from Kershaw to Trent isn't that long, and there is a strong argument to be made that besides Kershaw and Kershaw's potential heir apparent, it could also be Trent. Remember, a year ago, it was Eric Stults. A year earlier it was Brett
