Field of the Invention This invention relates to an automatic focusing camera and, more particularly, to a photoelectric automatic focusing camera of the so-called TTL (through the lens) system. 2. Description of the Prior Art In the conventional automatic focusing camera of the TTL system, there has been adopted, as a focusing photometric method, a method wherein an image of a focusing object formed on a focusing lens is formed onto a photoelectric transducer (hereinafter referred to as "photoelectric element") through the focusing lens, a quantity of light transmitted through the photoelectric element is received by a light receiving element of the photoelectric element, an output voltage of the light receiving element is applied to a controlling circuit to control the focusing lens to the front of a focusing position or to the rear thereof, thereby effecting a focusing control. In the above-described focusing photometric method, it is essential that the focusing lens is always kept in a focusing position. This requires the focusing lens to be moved to the front of the focusing position or to the rear thereof so as to effect a focusing control at every time a focusing
